THE LOVER'S DREAM.
BY C. L. MARION.

Adieu! my love, farewell forever!
God knows when you may meet again:
I'll never love you more again.
Although 'twill rend my heart in twain.
Wouldst thou know why I would leave thee?
Ask it of time, for time has heart:
'Tis long as I've been most severe.
I know 'twill rend my heart in twain,
I know 'twill rend my heart in twain,
I know 'twill rend my heart in twain.

We vowed our love—my soul! I love thee still
But thou wert false and loved me not.
Which doth my heart with vengeance hate
To meet the day when I am forgot.
I marked thee with my wandering eye,
I looked fair, yet a serpent, 'twas love's guise,
I saw thee, loved thee, and at your death swore:
'Tis long as I've been most severe.

Yes, with the innocence of a child,
'Tis long as I've been most severe.
Oh! thou creature, hold not thyself dear,
'Tis long as I've been most severe.
Yes, with the innocence of a child,
'Tis long as I've been most severe.

Ab! woman, well may thy bosom preat,
For I'll rend in those false arms!
By those once pure—mine own eyes were fed—
I'll never love thee more again!

The maid arose from where in grief she sat;
These words were rashly spoken;
She desired them not—her soul it shrank;
And thus she walked in secret tracks.

'Say, love, love—not so, my wrong me much;
Why wouldst thou seek my love to prove?
My love's not mine, but as the storm is near,
To turn my heart from him I love.'

'Wherefore, Gerald, this blind endeavor
To hide my life, and thus to sell?
I am loath to do so; believe me, ever,
Believe me, love, the truth I tell.'

He stood and gazed on the maiden's face,
Then softly laughed, and waved his hand;
'That once to me wert living grace,
But now thou art no more my hand.'

She started, and with tears her face
While in her breast fierce passion reared.
She weeping cried, 'My love, I still am true—
My love for thee has true remembrance.'

The lightning flashed, the thunder crashed,
And started much the dreamer awake.
A nation on him knees he fell,
And gently his fair love did stroke.

'Thank God! Oh, Gerald, art thou waked at last!
Methought thee dead, when I saw thee first;
Oh, love, love from sweet existence past,
My heart would surely with anguish burst.'

He raised his throbbing head, and wild looked round;
'"Hence! hence! Have I been ill?"
He asked. He gazed at Pauline, then the ground.
As he gazed, she was dreaming still.

White gentle hands did smooth his brow,
A loving voice spoke to his ear:
'No, not ill, you have but slept—
'Ask no more, but come the storm is near.'

Toward the cottage now they wander,
The strokes of fate his forehead smite:
'Love, let's ever be true as that other-
'Let never a doubt come between us.'

'Pray, dear Gerald, why speak you thus?
Oh, couldst thou ever doubt my love?
Did I ever ask you devoted thoughts—
'That should be forgotten from above?'

Then wretched Gerald told what he had dreamed,
Pauline listened pale and still;
'Thank God, 'twas not true as it had seemed,
Oh, forgive me, love, you surely will.'

'Forgive you? Gerald? Yes, my love, I do,
And rejoice 'twas but a dream, not a deed;
But endeavor, dear, I beseech of you,
To dream such dreams from this time on.'

HOW POTTRIDGE LOST HIS LUCK.

Mr. Thomas Pottridge, of Smallborough, had been renowned in his native town for his constant run of luck. He had a fortune of $40,000, and was reckoned the 'warmest' man there—an alderman who had been twice mayor of his city, a church-warden, and a very popular character among the fair sex by reason of his being a bachelor.

One or two things more only were wanted to complete his happiness; namely, a good wife, a nice little estate in the country, and the honor of Knighthood. Mr. Pottridge wished to become Sir Thomas Pottridge. Having long cherished this idea, and resolved, indeed, that he would not propose for the hand of pretty Lucy Dot, the banker's daughter, until he could make her a Ladyship, Mr. Pottridge ended by thinking that he could not secure his object except by causing him self to be re-elected Mayor, and arranging, if possible, that H. R. H., the Prince of Wales, should pay a visit to Smallborough during the term of his office.

Intent upon this scheme, Mr. Pottridge came up to town to call upon Lord Beaconsfield. Lord Beaconsfield hearkened kindly to the grocer's prayer. Smallborough was about to inaugurate some public baths, the first establishment of the kind ever seen in the town, and nothing could be more suitable than that the hero of the throng should preside over the ceremonial. 'Truly,' said the Premier politely, when he had heard the Alderman speak, 'the cleanliness of the people must always be a matter of interesting concern to those who are brought into relations with them. I shall be happy to take Lady Majesty's commands on the subject—albeit a spirit-inspired proposal which you have laid before me.'

'If you can manage it, my Lord, I should be glad if the visit could take place some time after the 9th of November next, for I shall be Mayor then and able to see that the reception given is a proper one.'

'Ah, quite so,' answered Lord Beaconsfield, dropping his eyeglasses, for he had studied Mr. Pottridge through it, and knew the man by heart.

Leaving Whitehall, Mr. Pottridge sauntered toward Regent street, and, as he walked along, he seemed rosy to him because of Miss Dot. He began to stare into the shop windows, admiring pretty things which he was tempted to buy for his love. He was tuffly over this fancy and fondling withal at the pocket where his check-book lay, when suddenly he beheld through the window a curious sight. An elegantly-dressed lady was seated at the counter examining pieces of Brussels lace. The shopman averted his head for an instant, and she deftly whipped up a yard of the costly texture and thrust it into her pocket. The shopman spread over the counter a number of square, flat boxes containing handkerchiefs, and once more turned away. Again the lady's deft hand went to work, and a couple of handkerchiefs found their way under her cloak. 'Now that woman must be a cunning poacher,' soliloquized the astonished Mr. Pottridge. 'She's a cunning thief, anyhow, and I'll just step in and warn the firm.'

He hesitated a moment, and while he hovered about the doorway the lady came out, escorted by an obsequious commissionaire with medals on his lapels. A footman, one of a row back on a bench like cypress, rose and signaled to the coachman of a handsomely-appointed brougham, who at once drove forward. Evidently this lady was not an ordinary thief. She was a tall, dark person of about 30, superbly dressed and very handsome.

Perceiving Mr. Pottridge and seeing his glance fixed on her as she waited for her carriage, she eyed him with aristocratic superciliousness and thereby settled her fate, for Smallborough's alderman, who could not brook the disdain of a shoplifter, hurried into the mercer's and explained what had happened, speaking in so excited a voice that a number of customers heard him.

Great commotion was caused by the announcement, and the shopman who had served her was quickly fired by the idea that he had let himself be outwitted. Daring out of the shop he accosted the thief as she was stepping into her carriage. 'Will you give me my bill, if you please? There is some mistake.'

'What mistake?' asked she, turning round with a flash in her eyes. But she grew ashy pale.

'Come back, please,' repeated the shopman, a pinkish young man, whose voice broke from emotion.

A small crowd had already collected and the lady was obliged to retrace her steps; but as she was about to enter the shop she slipped her hand into her pocket and let a piece of lace fall onto the pavement. 'No, no, no, that won't do,' cried Mr. Pottridge, seizing the lace and hurrying to get it into his pocket. 'What things fell by accident into the folds of your dress; we know that trick.' And, officiously acting as a searcher, he plucked his hand into the pocket despite the lady's struggles and drew out a second piece of lace, some yards in length, two pairs of new gloves, one pair of silk stockings and a lady's silk cravat. 'Well, I never!' exclaimed the pushing shopman, and there was a murmur among the bystanders, including the lady's own footman, who looked like a powdered figure of consternation.

'How dare you?' screamed the lady, purple with rage and mortification, as she glared at Mr. Pottridge; 'I'll prosecute you for assault. I told the shopman here that I meant to buy these things. Let the bill be sent to my address: I'm Mrs. Ponceforth-Keane.'

'Ah, decessy,' responded the shopman, 'but I'm just going to give you my card, and I'll be glad to see you at the door, be it to come to a blue-coated member of the force.'

One of the partners of the firm, a gray, civil-spoken man, who had been summoned from his study, now came forward; and he was at first disposed to rebuke the haste of his shopman, but it was too late. The policeman had already entered, and all the shopmen and shop-girls, the customers and the desultory people crowded around the door, were instant in chorusing that the thief should be made an example.

'The Magistrate is sitting now at Smallborough street, we'll just go there at once and have her charged.'

This arrangement was acceded to, and in a few minutes the lady and policeman (who had got abashed by this time from finding himself seated on the silk cushions of a carriage) were riding to the police court in Mrs. Ponceforth-Keane's own vehicle, while Mr. Pottridge, the shopman and the mercer followed on foot to give evidence.

One would think that in a case where the offense was flagrant and the testimony so clear the magistrate might have sentenced the defendant straight off to six months' imprisonment, and, indeed, had the thief been a person of the lower orders, it would probably have been her fate to be convicted summarily. But it turned out that Ponceforth-Keane was the real name of the elegant shoplifter, whose husband was a person moving, as reporters say, 'in the best ranks of society.'

Mr. Ponceforth-Keane was sent for, and arrived breathless in a hack from one of the best clubs in Pall Mall. At the sight of him his wife, who had been locked up for an hour in a police cell, wept profusely, and Mr. P. K. was himself much agitated. He asked for a remand, and tendered bail, saying he should produce medical evidence to the effect that his wife had lately suffered severely in health.

'Well, but she's a thief!' cried Mr. Pottridge, rousing himself and speaking with spirit. 'What harm can she or her friends do you?'

'Are you quite sure you saw her steal the things?' asked the mercer, glumly.

'Besides, supposing she did put them in her pocket, she says that she took her husband to send her the bill. 'I'm hanged if she did,' ejaculated the shopman, indignantly.

'Silence, sir,' answered the mercer, with a stern frown. 'If it is really a case of theft, you are self-condemned, for you ought to have kept your eyes about you. For some time past I have noticed that you have been very negligent in business.'

The shopman collapsed; as for Mr. Pottridge, he trudged back to his hotel, feeling half inclined to go and ask Lord Beaconsfield what he ought to do. The case had been adjourned for a week, so he traveled back to Smallborough in the evening, and by the time he reached his native town he had worked himself up into a state of contempt for the mercer and the metropolitan stipendiary, who seemed to draw a distinction between well-dressed and ill-dressed plainifiers.

Meeting Mr. Bangs, the brewer, on the railway station, he gave him an account of what had happened, and was beset to write sympathy until he mentioned the name of Ponceforth-Keane; when Mr. Bangs passed up his lips. 'Why, bless me, that's the cousin of Lord Keynole, a brother-in-law of our Lord Lieutenant—'

'What difference does that make?' stammered Mr. Pottridge like a man who feels less sure of his ground.

'Oh, nothing, except that I don't see why a lady of that sort should commit robberies,' responded Mr. Bangs.

Further down the street, Mr. Pottridge was rubbing his pate in vain, when he perceived, perched on Mr. Dot, the banker, whose daughter, Lucy, he loved. Ponceforth-Keane exclaimed Mr. Dot, as soon as he had heard the grocer's story. 'Why, Lord Keynole, his cousin, banks with us.'

'Well, but come Dot,' retorted Mr. Pottridge, impatiently, 'that's a reason why Mr. Ponceforth-Keane shouldn't be a dishonest party.'

'No, but I think the whole thing improbable,' answered the banker, and I confess I should be sorry if anything unpleasant happened to Lord Keynole's family.'

Mr. Pottridge was not in very good humor when he went to bed that night. A magistrate himself, he knew that shifts are often made to withdraw well-connected offenders from justice, and as far as he was concerned, he would have cared little had an appeal been made to him, ad misericordiam, to acknowledge that he had, perhaps, been mistaken in fancying that he saw Mrs. P. K. pocket some lace and handkerchiefs. But Mr. Pottridge could not bear to be pool-poked or threatened with unpleasant consequences if he did his duty. He was an alderman, a grocer with a blameless conscience, and he feared no man. Feeling that his character for veracity and common sense was at stake, he resolved to give his evidence against the wife of Lord Keynole's cousin with no more hesitation than if she were the commonest jailbird.

From that date, however, things began to go wrong somehow with Mr. Pottridge. It seemed as though his long luck had forsaken him. On the morrow of his adventure in London, Mr. Chock'worth, the principal solicitor of the town, who was Lord Keynole's legal adviser, passed him in the street without noticing, and later in the day, Mrs. C. sent a stiff note, begging that Mr. Pottridge would send in his bill, and intimating that she would henceforth purchase her groceries at another house. Now, the Chock'worths had always been excellent customers of Mr. Pottridge.

This was bad enough, but worse was to follow. Next day some inspectors of weights and measures arrived at the alderman's shop and found a piece of rail sticking under the scales. They declared they should make a report of the fact. Scarcely had they gone, however, when the grocer speechless with confusion, than two well-dressed strangers entered and brought some tea, bread, sugar, cocoa, pepper and a pot of mustard; after which they stated that they were public analysts, who were going to examine the quality of these goods. They examined them, in truth, so fast, that two days later Mr. Pottridge received a summons to answer a charge of getting half-pige in his tea, and, in his sugar, turmeric in his mustard, and in his cocoa, etc. Mr. Pottridge shrugged his shoulders at first, taking it for granted that the charge would be dismissed by his brother magistrates. They examined them, in truth, so fast, that two days later Mr. Pottridge received a summons to answer a charge of getting half-pige in his tea, and, in his sugar, turmeric in his mustard, and in his cocoa, etc. Mr. Pottridge shrugged his shoulders at first, taking it for granted that the charge would be dismissed by his brother magistrates.

'I am sorry for you, Mr. Pottridge,' said Mr. Dot, who sat as Chairman, 'but a man in your position should set an example. You are fined £20 on each count, with costs. Total, £130.'

Stunned Pottridge! He left the court, politically done for, for he could no longer hope to be re-elected mayor, nor to marry Miss Dot. He had always, moreover, to resign his aldermanship, and his personal character, as well as that of his tea and mustard, was ruined.

So ruined was Mr. Pottridge that when he went to London to give evidence against Mrs. Ponceforth-Keane, the first question asked him by the bench for the defence—a blistering Old Bailey barrister—was, 'I believe you have just been convicted of selling adulterated goods and of false weight?'

'Let me explain,' stammered poor Pottridge.

'No explanations, sir. Give me a plain answer, yes or no?'

'Yes, then.'

'Well, then, if you are liable to make mistakes about your weights, you may err in other things.'

'Perhaps,' replied the grocer, desperately, 'I may have been mistaken in thinking this lady was a thief. I have thought enough about the business.'

Mr. Pottridge was not even invited to the dinner at the Town Hall, whereof he paid his share like the other rate-payers.

He was no longer regarded as a lucky man.

Two Orangemen and the Catholics are still breaking each other's heads at Belfast for the love of God.

THE WEEKLY AGITATOR.

ISHPEMING, MICHIGAN, SEPT. 11.

The Champion mine shipped from the opening of navigation up to the 8th inst., 71,654 gross tons of ore.

The diamond drill for the New York mine arrived during the past week and the work of sinking the shaft, preparatory to its being put in operation, will be commenced in a few days.

Up to Wednesday last, the four big mines of the peninsula had shipped 552,681 gross tons of iron ore, the shipments for the week ending that day being 25,788 tons.

The diamond drill, which has been operated by the Cleveland company in the swamp near the office, has been stopped, having penetrated a depth of 750 feet, without, however, encountering any ore.

Is a letter dated at Houghton, Aug. 26th, 1880, one of the editors of the Iron Age, who accompanied the American Institute of Mining Engineers to this region, devotes considerable space to a brief review of the mines in and about Ishpeming, from which we make some extracts.

Regarding population, distances etc., the main facts are correct, as will be seen. The correspondent says: "Ishpeming, two miles west of Negaunee, has a population of 7,000, and embraces within the city limits the Cleveland, New York, Lake Superior and Barium iron mines, which are all first-class special ores, and are now worked independently, together with the Lake Angelina and Salisbury mines, which are worked above ground. The word Ishpeming is a Chippewa word signifying 'on the summit.' It was chosen because within the city limits is a natural divide, from one side of which flows the Carp river into Lake Superior and upon the other the Escanaba into Lake Michigan.

The following table exhibits the season's shipments of iron ore from L'Assse, from the opening of navigation up to and including Wednesday, Sept. 8:

Table with 2 columns: Mine Name, Shipments. Includes Champion, Lake Superior, Republic, Saginaw, etc.

ESCANABA.—The following table shows the shipments of iron ore from Escanaba from the opening of navigation up to and including Wednesday, Sept. 8:

Table with 2 columns: Mine Name, Shipments. Includes Marquette, Cleveland, Republic, etc.

The Lake Superior mine is about one half mile west of the Cleveland, and was opened in 1857. The workings are as extensive as those of any mine in the district.

Total shipments to January 1, 1880, 2,174,580—a little larger output than any other company's. The Lake Superior has also shipped more ore in a year than any other mine of this district.

"Only a short distance southeast of the Lake Superior mine workings is the 'Union' shaft by the Cleveland and Superior companies somewhat nearer the surface. The same company is also sinking a small shaft about ten or twelve rods northeast of its new engine house, with a view to determining the dip of the vein at that point.

These mines are situated upon a branch of the Marquette, Houghton & Ontonagon railroad, about three miles from Ishpeming.
